Kalamazoo is located 11 miles off the main line of the Grand Trunk, reached only by a little spur that backs up to it from Pavillion, the location of a saw-mill somewhere up here beyond Vicksburg. She would seem to be laboring under the impression that the railway company can be induced to rebuild its shops, recently burned at Port Huron, in that city, and run all the cars manufactured down the little spur to reach the main line of transportation, 35 miles from any considerable shipping point. But the Kalamazoo Chamber of commerce is an active little body and flows no chips to He unturned, when ight of getting anything for that thriving town. By this process it recently secured the western division repair shops of the Michigan Central aboring for years to induce the Frand Trunk to shift its main line to the north, touching Kalamazoo and then turning southward toward South Bend, making the former city an important point on that road.

It is hinted that this agitation will be revived incident to the negotiations to be taken up with the road to the end of securing the car shops, and if the celery burg is willing to offer enough inducements, its chances may prove better than the surface shows. An army of 1,500 laborers, under the direction of the police, were kept at work throughout the night and a new force was put on duty Saturday morning, shoveling away the snow which ceased falling. Managers of a majority of the business houses and offices feared they would be compelled to close down their buildings Saturday because of the shortages of coal. The police permitted delivery only at the most crowded hotels and the few residences that could be reached.
